

Human Sciences Encounters in Phnom-Penh

Researcher Profil

Jonathon Louth

Jonathon Louth is a senior lecturer in international politics at the University of Chester in the United Kingdom. Much of his research focuses on how we think about international relations and the social sciences in general. Here, the fascination is with the 'new' sciences, like complexity theory, and the manner in which they may impact social thought, international relations theory and international political economy. This informs his emerging work on Southeast Asia and the politics of wider economic integration across the region. He is interested in a range of intersections including links between emerging markets, contested concepts of security and critical international political economy. This has generated work on gender, everyday lives, financialisation, constructions of order and the impact of economic thought upon social structures. These interests have informed forthcoming work on the production of order, resilience, neoliberalism and governance arrangements.